Turkish Wedding: Once There Was, Once There Wasn't Judith Reynolds Brown

Anne, being in love with a Turkish man whom she has met while he is studying in the U.S., decides before she marries him to go home to Turkey with him to see if she can live happily in his cultural setting. When they arrive at his home in a backwater city of Turkey, her experiment starts off precariously. The young Turkish man, embarrassed to arrive in his hometown with a woman unmarried, has innocently betrayed her by telling his parents they are married. His Sufi Muslim grandfather becomes her mentor, his rebellious adolescent sister becomes her good friend, his mother rejects her, and the man she loves himself learns more of what she hopes for and needs. The decision to actually make this marriage, however, is not easy, and her final decision emerges based on no reasons she could have anticipated.
