Walking as Saints Aubrey Ramage-Lay

I quake to describe him, but I suppose I must... I must begin with his most notable feature, the one that draws the eye like a magnet before which one is powerless to resist is his chest. Specifically the malignant radiation that shines palpably through it from the dark and foul apparatus that he must call his heart. So filled with hate is this terrible organ that it overflows into the visual field, bubbling like some dark chemical from the very pores of his chest. This black smoky malevolence is in sharp contrast to the radiant white of his skin and it twists and coils around him, shrouding his hands and feet in its awful darkness. His face is serene and beautiful in an unearthly way and all the more dread for it, no human face was ever made so perfectly. His eyes are pure white light rimmed in black tears and he wears a terrible halo of hate like a crown upon his head. His great black wings seem almost to eat the light around him as he stands arms outstretched before me. His body is perfect save that he has no genitalia of any sort. I am not truly a religious man, I never attend services, but even I know what stands before me; it is Lucifer.
