Excerpt from The Manufacture of Iron in Great Britain: With Remarks on the Employment of Capital in Iron-Works and Collieries

Having, during several years experience in the Iron Trade and Manufacture, frequently observed the heavy losses incurred by capitalists investing in that branch of manufacture, such losses often arising from want of practical knowledge of the subject, I have, in the following pages, endeavoured, however indifferently I may have succeeded, to give a succinct and clear view of the main principles and practice of the manufacture of Iron, as at present conducted in this country, and also to point out the chief causes that usually prevent such undertakings from being conducted to a successful issue.
